

Private Brigham (Brigam elsewhere) Hann (Regimental Number 3799) is interred in Haringhe (Bandaghem) Military Cemetery – Grave reference III. C. 53.

His occupation prior to military service recorded as that of a fisherman, Brigham Hann was a recruit of the Fifteenth Draft. Having presented himself for medical examination at the Church Lads Brigade Armoury in St. John's on May 18 of 1917, he then enlisted - engaged for the duration of the war at the private soldier's rate of $1.10 per diem – and also attested on that same day.

Private Hann did not leave St. John's until August 4 of that year. On that day he marched down to St. John's harbour and boarded the Bowring Brothers' vessel, Florizel (right)*. The destination was Halifax, Nova Scotia, from where the Newfoundland draft now took ship – thus far un-identified: maybe Missanabie but this is far from certain - to cross the Atlantic to the United Kingdom.

Albeit a second source claims that the contingent left St. John's by train.*

Arriving in England the contingent entrained for the west coast of Scotland. By this time, the Regimental Depot at Ayr had already been in existence to serve as the base for the 2nd (Reserve) Battalion of the Newfoundland Regiment for some two years. It was from here – as of November of 1915 and up until January of 1918 – that the new-comers from home had been despatched in drafts, at first to Gallipoli and later to the Western Front, to bolster the four fighting companies of 1st Battalion.

(Right above: an aerial view of Ayr – probably from the period between the Wars: Newton-on Ayr is to the left of the River Ayr and the Royal Borough is to the right. – courtesy of the Carnegie Library at Ayr)

Private Hann spent the five months succeeding his arrival in the United Kingdom at the Regimental Depot at Ayr and likely also at Barry*. In the latter half of January of the New Year, 1918, 2nd (Reserve) Battalion was to move quarters from Scotland to southern England, to Hazely Down, Hampshire, not far distant from the historic cathedral city of Winchester.

It was there that Private Hann would have been stationed at the beginning of February when he was ordered to join the British Expeditionary Force on the Continent.

During the summer months of 1917, 2nd (Reserve) Battalion had been transferred from Ayr to not-so-distant Barry in the region of Dundee. Initially intended to be a permanent move, the protest from several quarters was so great that the Newfoundlanders were back in Ayr by the third week of September.*

(Right above: a bleak-looking Hazely Down Camp at some time during the winter of 1918 – from The War Illustrated)

On February 4, the 36th Re-enforcement Draft of two hundred other ranks from Hazely Down – Private Hann among its ranks - passed through the English port of Southampton on its way to the Continent. On the 6th the Newfoundlanders landed in the French port of Rouen for the inevitable final training and organization at the Base Depot before finding their way to the front.

(Right: British troops disembark at Rouen en route to the Western Front. – from Illustration)

Apparently, the standard length of time for this final training at the outset of the war had been ten days – although this was to become more and more flexible as the War progressed - in areas near Rouen, Étaples, LeHavre and Harfleur that became known notoriously to the troops as the Bull Rings.*

(continued)

A detachment of one-hundred seventy-three other ranks from Rouen – Private Hann among that number - reported to duty with 1st Battalion at Steenvoorde, on the Franco-Belgian frontier, on the 15th of that February, the day before an inspection by Major-General Beauvoir de Lisle, Officer Commanding 29th Division, a parade complete with presentation of decorations and the announcement that the Newfoundland Regiment was to be designated as Royal.

Meanwhile, at the close of the Battle of Cambrai at the beginning of December of 1917, 1st Battalion – once again badly under-strength due to the heavy casualties incurred – had been withdrawn from the area of the front lines to re-enforce and to re-organize. The following weeks had been spent at first to the south-west of the city of Arras, at Humbercourt and then at some distance to the north-west, at Fressin.

The weather obliged and even allowed the Newfoundlanders some snow, a bit too much at times apparently.

At the beginning of January of 1918, and after that snowy Christmas period spent to the west of Arras and withdrawn from the front, the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion had been ordered into Belgium, to the Ypres Salient, for a third time.

There, like the other British and Empire troops in the area, they were to spend much of their time building and strengthening defences. It was during a period while 1st Battalion was out of the lines that Private Hann reported to active service.

(Above right: an aerial view of Ypres, taken towards the end of 1916 – from Illustration)

Meanwhile, while the Allies built their defences, by the beginning of 1918 the Germans were preparing for a final effort to win the War: the Allies were exhausted and lacking man-power after their exertions of 1917 - the British had fought three campaigns and some units of the French Army had mutinied - and the Germans had available the extra divisions that their victory over the Russians in the East now allowed them.

It was expected that the Germans would launch a spring offensive. While they were waiting, the Newfoundlanders continued to dig.

(Right above: countryside in-between Zonnebeke and Passchendaele (today Passendale) in the vicinity of where the Newfoundlanders were stationed in March and early April of 1918 – photograph from 2011)

Then the Germans did as was expected of them. Ludendorff's armies had already launched a powerful thrust on March 21, striking at first in the area of the Somme, overrunning the battlefields of 1916 and beyond; for a while the advance seemed unstoppable.

(continued)

Then a second offensive, Georgette, was launched in the northern sector of the front, in Flanders, where the Newfoundlanders were stationed: the date was April 9.

Within two days the situation of the Allies was desperate.

(Right above: British troops on the retreat in Flanders in April of 1918 – from Illustration)

On the day after the first heavy bombardments, April 10, as the Germans approached the towns of Armentières and Nieppe, troops were deployed to meet them. The Newfoundlanders, due to come out of the line and move back to the Somme, boarded buses at three o'clock in the afternoon and were suddenly directed southward, towards Nieppe.

They were in action, attempting to stem this latest offensive, three hours later.

(Right above: the area of La Crêche - the buildings in the background - where the Newfoundlanders de-bussed on April 10 to meet the Germans in the area of Steenwerck and its railway station – photograph from 2010.)

The British were pushed back to the frontier area of France and Belgium. On the 12th of April 1st Battalion, fighting in companies rather than as a single entity, was making a series of stands.

On April 13, during the defensive action near the De Seule crossroads on the Franco-Belgian border, one platoon of 'C' Company was obliterated while trying to check the German advance. The remainder of 'C' Company took up defensive positions along a light railway line and, with 'A' Company, stopped a later enemy attack. 'B' and 'D' Companies – in a failed counter-attack on that evening - were equally heavily involved.

(Right above: ground just to the east of Bailleul where 1st Battalion fought during the period April 12 to 21 – photograph from 2013)

What exact role Private Hann played during those frantic times is not known - it seems not even to be recorded of which Company he was a soldier - but from April 10 to 21 was to be a difficult eleven days for all of 1st Battalion's personnel. Nevertheless, somehow, the German breakthrough never materialised and the front finally stabilised.

(continued)

(Previous page: These are the De Seule crossroads almost one-hundred years later, lying astride the Franco-Belgian frontier, and also the scene of fierce fighting involving 1st Battalion on April 12 -13, 1918. Today there are several houses and a convenience store. – photograph from 2009(?))

Only days after the crisis of the German spring offensive had passed, on April 24, the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion said farewell to their comrades-in-arms of 88th Brigade and 29th Division. On the following day there was a recessional parade. 1st Battalion was to later be deployed to another unit, but for the summer of 1918 it was to move a world away from Flanders where it had just fought, to be stationed on the west coast of France.

On April 29, the Newfoundlanders – 1st Battalion by now reduced to a total strength of just thirty officers and four-hundred sixty-four other ranks - took train in Belgium for the French coastal town of Étaples, where they arrived at eleven o'clock in the late evening. For now, for them, the fighting was a thing of the past.

The summer of 1918 was to pass peaceably enough for most of the personnel of 1st Battalion. For the months of May, June and until early July, the unit was posted to Écuire, to the Headquarters of Douglas Haig, Commander-in-Chief of the British Expeditionary Force in Europe.

(Right: Haig, Commander-in-Chief of the British Expeditionary Force at the time of the Battalion's posting to GHQ – from Illustration)

The cosmetic honour of this new role, however, masked the reality that the 1st Battalion of the recently-proclaimed Royal Newfoundland Regiment was no longer capable of serving in the field.

Although few at home cared to admit it publicly, the problem was that 1st Battalion had run out of reserves and was unable to continue as a fighting entity. It was to be September before even a battalion of reduced strength could return to active service. At home, mandatory military service was initiated – conscription by another name – but with limited results.*

The only fly in the ointment of Private Hann's summer was a case of tonsillitis. On June 5 he reported to the 20th Field Ambulance with a PUO (Pain of Unknown Origin) and was immediately sent on to the 59th Casualty Clearing Station at Hesdin from where, a week later, he was moved to the 24th General Hospital at Étaples. On June 21, Private Hann was transferred once more, to the 72nd General Hospital at Trouville and then to the nearby 15th Convalescent Depot on the 27th.

(Right above: transferring sick and wounded from a field ambulance to the rear through the mud by motorized ambulance and man-power – from a vintage post-card)

(continued)

(Preceding page bottom: a British casualty clearing station – the one pictured here under canvas for mobility if and when the necessity arose – being established somewhere in France during the early years of the War – from a vintage post-card)

Released to the Base Depot at Rouen on July 17, Private Hann was back with 1st Battalion in the field on July 25.

The posting to Écuire completed, for most of July and all of August the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion were encamped in much the same area, close to the coastal village of Équihe – itself not far removed from the large Channel port of Boulogne – and far to the rear of the fighting, of which there had been plenty elsewhere.

(Right above: a view of the sparsely-populated coastal community of Équihe at or about the time of the Great War – from a vintage post-card)

Re-enforced, the Newfoundlanders returned to the fray on Friday, September 13, as one of the three battalions of the 28th Brigade of 9th Scottish Division. 1st Battalion was once more to serve on the Belgian front where, some six weeks later, having advanced out of the Ypres Salient, it would finish its war on October 26 at a place called Inghoyghem (Ingoogem).

On September 28, the Belgian Army and the 2nd British Army broke out of their positions, overrunning the enemy lines. It was the start, for them, of the *Hundred Days Offensive. On the following day, the Newfoundlanders were fighting at the Keiberg Ridge. After almost four years of stalemate, it was once again to be a conflict of movement.

(Right: British troops and German prisoners in Flanders during the Hundred Days – from Illustration)

This offensive would prove to be the final campaign of the Western Front and would terminate with the Armistice of November 11. It had begun further to the south on July 18 on the French front on the River Marne, followed on August 8 by an onslaught by British and Empire troops near Amiens in what would also become known as 3rd Somme.*

On September 29, the Newfoundlanders were advancing in the area of the Keiberg Ridge and the nearby village of Dadizeele. Here it was, on that day, that Private Hann was wounded. He was evacuated from the field and admitted into the 87th Field Ambulance having incurred multiple gun-shot injuries to the head.

(Right: a British field ambulance, of a more permanent nature than some – from a vintage post-card)

(continued)

After preliminary treatment Private Hann was subsequently transferred to the 36th Casualty Clearing Station at Rousbrugge.

(Right: the re-constructed village of Dadizeele (Dadizele) just to the north of which the Newfoundlanders dug in on the evening of September 29, 1918 – photograph from 2013)

The son of Jacob Hann, fisherman, and Sarah Susannah Hann (née Wight, deceased April 28, 1909) of Birchy Head, Bonne Bay (but formerly from Seal Cove – which Seal Cove does not appear to be clear) he was brother to Percival-Clyde (deceased 1914), to Hilda-May-Olive and to Lydia-Adena*. He was also nephew to Samuel Hann of Bonne Bay (he also formerly from Seal Cove) to whom he had allotted a daily fifty cents from his pay.

Private Hann was reported as having died of wounds on September 30, 1918, at the same 36th CCS.

Brigham Hann had enlisted at the age of eighteen years and five months.

Just about all based on a single unconfirmed document. If all the rest is correct then Private Hann would have been baptized W. Brigham Ambrose Hann.*

(Right above: Private Hann's sacrifice is honoured on the War Memorial at Woody Point. - photograph from 2010)

Private Brigham Hann was awarded the British War Medal (on left) and also the Victory Medal (Inter-Allied War Medal).

