

Private Eleazar Henry Horwood (Regimental Number 3694) is buried in Harlebeke New Cemetery – Grave reference IX. A. 6.

His occupation prior to military service recorded as that of a fisherman earning a monthly twenty-six dollars, Eleazar Henry Horwood was a recruit of the Fourteenth Draft. He enlisted at the Church Lads Brigade Armoury in St. John's on April 27 1917 - engaged for the duration of the war at the private soldier's rate of $1.10 per diem – and also attested on the same April 27. Apparently he did not present himself for medical examination until the following day, the 28th.

Private Horwood was not to depart from Newfoundland until May 19, when the Bowring Brothers' vessel Florizel (right) left en route to Halifax. His contingent of three officers and one-hundred eighty-two other ranks, and also ninety-nine recruits of the newly-formed Newfoundland Forestry Unit, then left Nova Scotia for the United Kingdom on board an unspecified* vessel, on May 29.

The ship in question may well have been the White Star liner Olympic (right) – sister ship to Titanic – requisitioned as a troop transport during the war, which sailed on June 2 from Halifax with Canadian military personnel as well – there are no other departures on or about this date. May 29 may have been the date of embarkation by the Newfoundland contingent.*

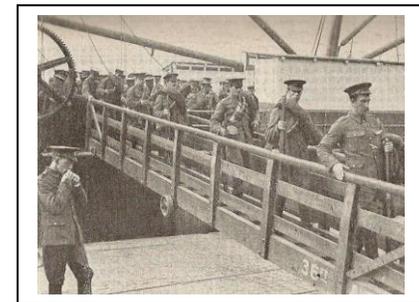

Arriving in the English west-coast port of Liverpool on June 9 the contingent entrained for the west coast of Scotland. By this time, the Regimental Depot at Ayr had already been in existence as the base for the 2nd (Reserve) Battalion of the Newfoundland Regiment for some two years. It was from here – since November of 1915 and up until January of 1918 – that the new-comers from home were being despatched in drafts, at first to Gallipoli and later to the Western Front, to bolster the four fighting companies of 1st Battalion.

(Right above: an aerial view of Ayr – probably from the period between the Wars: Newton-on Ayr is to the left of the River Ayr and the Royal Borough is to the right. – courtesy of the Carnegie Library at Ayr)

During the summer months of 1917, 2nd (Reserve) Battalion was transferred from Ayr to not-so-distant Barry in the region of Dundee. Initially intended to be a permanent move, the protest from several quarters was so great that the Newfoundlanders were back in Ayr by the third week of September.*

It was then not to be until November 6, 1917, that Private Horwood took ship again; on this occasion he was on his way to the Continent, passing through the English south-coast port of Southampton as a soldier among the one-hundred eleven other ranks of the 32nd Draft from Ayr. The Newfoundlanders disembarked in Rouen on the following day and made their way to the large British Expeditionary Force Base Depot there for a few days of final training and organizing* before making their way to a rendezvous with 1st Battalion.

(Right above: British troops disembark at Rouen en route to the Western Front. – from Illustration)

Apparently, the standard length of time for this final training at the outset of the war had been ten days – although this was to become more and more flexible as the War progressed - in areas near Rouen, Étapes, LeHavre and Harfleur that became known notoriously to the troops as the Bull Rings.*

(continued)

By that time, the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion had been withdrawn from the Passchendaele campaign, on October 17, in order to prepare for yet another upcoming offensive: Cambrai. The unit had been ordered back south from Belgium into northern France to re-enforce, to organize and to train in the vicinity of Berles-au-Bois, a rural community a dozen or so kilometres to the south-west of Arras.

It was there that, on November 14, four officers and one-hundred forty-one other ranks – one of them Private Horwood – reported from Rouen to duty with 1st Battalion.

That new offensive, the so-called Battle of Cambrai, was to officially last for just two weeks and a day, from November 20 until December 4, the Newfoundlanders directly involved at all times during that period.

The battle began well for the British who used tanks on a large scale for the first time; but opportunities were squandered and by its close the British had relinquished as much territory as they had gained. 1st Battalion was again dealt with severely, at Marcoing and at Masnières - where a Caribou stands today: of the total of five-hundred fifty-eight officers and men who went into battle, two-hundred forty-eight had become casualties by the end of the second day.

(Right above: The Canal St-Quentin at Masnières, the crossing of which and the establishment of a bridgehead being the first objectives for the Newfoundlanders on November 20, the first day of the Battle of Cambrai. – photograph from 2009)

On December 4, 1st Battalion had left behind it the theatre of – and with it the exertions of – the Battle of Cambrai. The unit was subsequently billeted in the vicinity of the community of Humbercourt, a number of kilometres just to the south-west of Arras. The Newfoundlanders remained there until the 18th when they marched to Fressin, some fifty kilometres to the north-west. There they were to spend both Christmas and New Year.

The weather obliged and even allowed the Newfoundlanders some snow, a bit too much at times apparently.

At the beginning of January of 1918, and after that snowy Christmas period spent to the west of Arras and withdrawn from the front, the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion had been ordered into Belgium, to the Ypres Salient, for a third time.

There, as it was with the other British and Empire troops in the area, they were to spend much of their time building and strengthening defences.

(Right: an aerial view of Ypres, taken towards the end of 1916 – from Illustration)

Hardly had Private Horwood arrived in Belgium when, on January 26, he was sent to the 89th Field Ambulance. On the same day he was forwarded to the 17th Casualty Clearing Station at the Rémy Siding, Poperinghe - the complaint an ulcerated toe.

The next report in Private Horwood's documents shows him spending time at the 8th Corps Rest Station for convalescence and it was from there that he was discharged to duty with 1st Battalion on or about February 2.

(Right above: transferring sick and wounded from a field ambulance to the rear through the mud by motorized ambulance and man-power – from a vintage post-card)

(Right: a British casualty clearing station – the one pictured here under canvas for mobility if and when the necessity arose – being established somewhere in France during the early years of the War – from a vintage post-card)

Meanwhile, while the Allies built their defences, by the beginning of 1918 the Germans were preparing for a final effort to win the War: the Allies were exhausted and lacking man-power after their exertions of 1917 - the British had fought three campaigns and some units of the French Army had mutinied - and the Germans had available the extra divisions that their victory over the Russians in the East now allowed them.

It was expected that the Germans would launch a spring offensive. While they were waiting, the Newfoundlanders continued to dig.

(Above right: countryside in-between Zonnebeke and Passchendaele (today Passendale) in the vicinity of where the Newfoundlanders were to be stationed in March and early April of 1918 – photograph from 2011)

Then the Germans did as was expected of them. Ludendorff's armies had already launched a powerful thrust on March 21, striking at first in the area of the Somme, overrunning the battlefields of 1916 and beyond; for a while the advance seemed unstoppable. Then a second offensive, Georgette, was launched in the northern sector of the front, in Flanders, where the Newfoundlanders were stationed: the date was April 9. Within two days the situation of the Allies was desperate.

(Right above: British troops on the retreat in Flanders in April of 1918 – from Illustration)

On the day after the first heavy bombardments, April 10, as the Germans approached the towns of Armentières and Nieppe, troops were deployed to meet them. The Newfoundlanders, due to come out of the line and move back to the Somme, boarded buses at three o'clock in the afternoon and were suddenly directed southward, towards Nieppe.

(continued)

They were in action, attempting to stem this latest offensive, three hours later.

(Previous page: the area of La Crêche - the buildings in the background - where the Newfoundlanders de-bussed on April 10 to meet the Germans in the area of Steenwerck and its railway station – photograph from 2010.)

The British were pushed back to the frontier area of France and Belgium. On the 12th of April 1st Battalion, fighting in companies rather than as a single entity, was making a series of stands.

On April 13, during the defensive action near the De Seule crossroads on the Franco-Belgian border, one platoon of 'C' Company was obliterated while trying to check the German advance. The remainder of 'C' Company took up defensive positions along a light railway line and, with 'A' Company, stopped a later enemy attack. 'B' and 'D' Companies – in a failed counter-attack on that evening - were equally heavily involved.

(Right above: ground just to the east of Bailleul where 1st Battalion fought during the period April 12 to 21 – photograph from 2013)

What exact role Private Horwood played during this frantic period is not known, apart from the Diary entry (see immediately below) - it is recorded only that he was a soldier of 'C' Company - but from April 10 to 21 was to be a difficult eleven days for all of 1st Battalion's personnel. Nevertheless, somehow, the German breakthrough never materialised and the front finally stabilised.

The Regimental War Diary cites ...the remainder of 'C' Coy. under Capt. Paterson, M.C. and Hqrs. took up a position along a light railway line and prepared to fight to a finish. ...there can be no doubt that it was Hqrs., 'A' & 'C' Coys. that by their resistance saved what would have been at least a very serious position for the whole 34th Division.*

88th Brigade – therefore 1st Battalion – was seconded from 29th Division to the 34th Division during this critical period.*

(Right above: These are the De Seule crossroads, lying astride the Franco-Belgian frontier, and also the scene of fierce fighting involving 1st Battalion on April 12 -13, 1918. Today there are several houses and a convenience store. – photograph from 2009(?))

Only days after the crisis of the German spring offensive had passed, on April 24, the Newfoundlanders of 1st Battalion said farewell to their comrades-in-arms of 88th Brigade and 29th Division. On the following day there was a recessional parade. 1st Battalion was to later be deployed to another unit, but for the summer of 1918 it was to move a world away from Flanders where it had just fought, to be stationed on the west coast of France.

On April 29, the Newfoundlanders – 1st Battalion by now reduced to a total strength of just thirty officers and four-hundred sixty-four other ranks - took train in Belgium for the French coastal town of Étaples, where they arrived at eleven o'clock in the late evening. For now, for them, the fighting was a thing of the past.

The summer of 1918 was to pass peaceably enough for most of the personnel of 1st Battalion. For the months of May, June and until early July, the unit was posted to Écuire, to the Headquarters of Douglas Haig, Commander-in-Chief of the British Expeditionary Force in Europe.

(Right: Haig, Commander-in-Chief of the British Expeditionary Force at the time of the Battalion's posting to GHQ – from Illustration)

The cosmetic honour of this new role, however, masked the reality that the 1st Battalion of the recently-proclaimed Royal Newfoundland Regiment was no longer capable of serving in the field.

Although few at home cared to admit it publicly, the problem was that 1st Battalion had run out of reserves and was unable to continue as a fighting entity. It was to be September before even a battalion of reduced strength could return to active service. At home, mandatory military service was initiated – conscription by another name – but with limited results.*

In the meantime, Private Horwood had once again sought after medical attention. On May 23 he had been admitted into the 24th General Hospital at Étaples, and as with many others during this period, was found to be suffering from influenza. Released to Base Depot on the last day of that same month, he was back with his unit on June 3.

The posting to Écuire completed, for most of July and all of August the Newfoundlanders were encamped in much the same area, close to the coastal village of Équihe – itself not far removed from the large Channel port of Boulogne – and far to the rear of the fighting, of which there had been plenty elsewhere.

(Right: a view of the sparsely-populated coastal community of Équihe at or about the time of the Great War – from a vintage post-card)

The Newfoundlanders returned to the fray on Friday, September 13, as one of the three battalions of the 28th Brigade of 9th Scottish Division. 1st Battalion was once more to serve on the Belgian front where, some six weeks later, having advanced out of the Ypres Salient, it would finish its war on October 26 at a place called Inghoyghem (Ingooigem).

On September 28, the Belgian Army and the 2nd British Army broke out of their positions, overrunning the enemy lines. It was the start, for them, of the *Hundred Days Offensive. On the following day, the Newfoundlanders were fighting at the Keiberg Ridge. After almost four years of stalemate, it was once again to be a conflict of movement.

(continued)

(Right: British troops and German prisoners in Flanders during the Hundred Days – from Illustration)

This offensive would prove to be the final campaign of the Western Front and would terminate with the Armistice of November 11. It had begun further to the south on July 18 on the French front on the River Marne, followed on August 8 by an onslaught by British and Empire troops near Amiens in what would also become known as 3rd Somme.*

The advance, despite fierce resistance at times, was relentless. On the night of October 19-20, 1st Battalion crossed the Lys Canal under fire just to the east of Courtrai – today Kortrijk - on barrel bridges and on the morrow was advancing towards the village of Vichte.

(Right: the Lys – both canal and river – at a point not far from the crossing-place – right to left - of October 19-20, 1918 - The Harlebeke Caribou stands about one hundred metres behind the camera. – photograph from 2010)

The son of George, fisherman, and Tamar (Annie) Horwood (née Mills) – to whom he had allotted a daily sixty cents from his pay - of Moreton's Harbour, Notre Dame Bay, he was likely also brother to Abraham, Susannah, Eleazer, Laura Warwick and Kate.

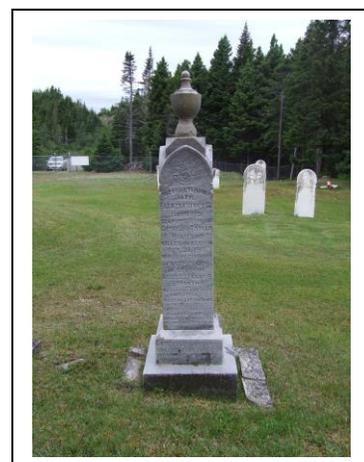

Private Horwood, a Lewis gunner, was reported as having been killed in action on October 20, 1918, while serving with 'C' Company in the advance of that day towards the Belgian village of Vichte.

Henry Horwood had enlisted at the age of twenty-two years and four months.

(Right above: The Caribou at Courtrai – today Kortrijk – commemorates the crossing of the Lys Canal and the sacrifice of the Hundred Days Offensive. – photograph from 2012)

(Right: the family monument erected to commemorate the sacrifice of Private Horwood and which is to be found in Moreton's Harbour Methodist Cemetery – photograph from 2013)

(continued)

Private Eleazar Henry Horwood was entitled to the British War Medal (on left) and also to the Victory Medal (Inter-Allied War Medal).

